And instead of thinking that we are living at the end of writing, I think that in another sense we are living in the extension – the overwhelming extension – of writing. I decided to focus on an essay by Fred Botting, which actually combined multiple contemporary critical theories, but mainly Deconstructive Theory, because Deconstructionism is a movement I always struggled with Reading Literature After Deconstruction - Student Edition bit in school. The consequence is that the meaning, as a repetition of whatever minimal sense it always has, is in fact a usually slight but potentially quite extreme alteration of what it means in other repetitions, other incarnations.

What is fascinating is perhaps the event of a singularity powerful enough to formalize the questions and theoretical laws concerning it. He argued that Austin had missed the fact that any speech event is framed by a "structure of absence" the words that are left unsaid due to contextual constraints and by "iterability" the constraints on what can be said, given by what has been said in the past.

ThisJonathanCullerhassuppliedinOnDeconstructionwithhiscustomarylu is nothing special or important about it at all. The reason for this is not because it is particularly difficult to understand—it is not a complex concept in the theoretical sense—it is just that it is supposed to designate a structural condition that cannot in itself be understood.
