Neal King argues that females in these films are often represented as rookies, unsure of their professional selves or otherwise as undercover detective cops. Soon after, a edition of the Crime Control Act was passed, mandating that any educational institution that received LEAA funds could not discriminate on the basis of gender, race, or any other protected categories, and so many educational opportunities for women were developed in the criminal justice field during this time. Important to note is that these limited representations are not limited to within the policing profession, but rather reflect a broader trend of narrow media images of women in general.
